Proposed Projects

1. Diffusion of Needle-stick Prevention Strategies—NEW—National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH)—Occupational exposure to bloodborne pathogens (including the hepatitis B and C viruses and the human immunodeficiency virus) poses a risk to workers in the health care industry and related occupations. The primary route of exposure to bloodborne pathogens is accidental percutaneous injury by a needle or similar sharp object.

In 1991 the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) enacted the final Bloodborne Pathogen Standard. Although the OSHA standard has increased compliance and awareness of needle-stick injury prevention strategies, needle-stick injuries are still occurring.

Studies have demonstrated that the use of safer needle-stick prevention devices can reduce the incidence of needle-stick injuries and resulting costs. Little is known however, about how many hospitals have adopted devices such as, safer blood collection needles (SBCN) designed to prevent percutaneous injuries, and the variables that can influence their adoption by hospitals.

This study will conduct a random sample national survey of 960 infection control practitioners to evaluate how widespread the adoption of SBCN and other needle-stick prevention devices is in hospitals; and some of the internal and external environmental variables that can influence their adoption. The survey data may be used to indicate a hospital's readiness to adopt SBCN, to assess the extent of the diffusion of SBCN, and to cluster hospitals according to their stage of adoption for SBCN.

The goal of this study is to (1) inform future NIOSH communication/dissemination strategies to promote safer blood collection and related medical devices in hospitals, (2) inform policy makers about variables that can influence the adoption of safer blood collection devices, and (3) provide data that reveals national trends for the adoption of safer needles-tick prevention devices in hospitals. There cost to the respondents is $0.00.
